PREFACE

The recipes herein given are in the main the results of actual experience gained by the compiler in ministering to the wants of a dear Mother who for many years was a sufferer from that dread malady Diabetes.

Only those familiar with such conditions realize the necessity of a strict diet, and the care that must be exercised in selecting foods that will not prove injurious to the patient. A long list of otherwise wholesome foods are almost like poison in their effect in diabetes and the necessity of continuous watchfulness and abstinence from the most tempting foods hangs like a dark shadow over the lives of the poor sufferers, marring much of pleasure in life.

To ameliorate this condition and to remove this ever pressing pang of fear the author has given years of her life to the study and preparation of foods at once nutritious, wholesome, and palatable, yet in every respect in accordance with the requirements of physicians and free from any deleterious effects. By strictly observing the recipes in this little book one may prepare sumptuous meals of which diabetics may partake without fear of any evil consequences, and thus enjoy a degree of happiness and mental repose which more than anything else, tends towards prolonging life.

I may add that I am publishing these recipes in response to many requests of physicians who have recommended them to their patients and in the hope that their wider dissemination may give a larger number of sufferers encouragement and material aid in their struggle against their malady.

INTRODUCTION

At the present day, diabetes is successfully treated by prophylactic, hygienic, dietetic and medicinal methods. One dare not contravene the asseveration, that some cases of the disease, if recognized sufficiently early, may even be cured. Some one has made the sapient observation that, "the only chance a diabetic has of being cured is to believe that he is never cured." From the latter, the paraphrast deduces that the diabetic must constantly avoid all hygienic and dietetic indiscretions. The medicinal treatment of diabetics is a disappointment and the best results are attained by a diet which practically excludes carbo-hydrates (starches and sugars). Physicians realize how difficult it is to execute a regimen of this kind inasmuch as the craving for starches and sugars, especially for bread, is most intense. It is a matter of common observation that a tranquilized nervous system aids the dietetic treatment of diabetics and if the patient is placed on a rigid and unpalatable dietetic system, the worry incident to the deprivation of certain foods, in addition to over-indulgence in foods which are permitted, may defeat the very object to be desired.

Miss Caro has been eminently successful in preparing a large variety of delicacies, without the use of carbo-hydrates and by so doing has conciliated the appetite of the diabetics. One can not say that she has absolutely excluded all starchy food from her delicacies but it is in a measure an advantage, inasmuch as the modern physician permits a more liberal dietary in diabetes. Her diet lists are at least not deceptive, which cannot be said of many substitutes for bread on the market which contain not only as much starch as wheaten bread but possess no nutriment at all.

I may say in conclusion that the dietary of a diabetic must be constantly supervised by a physician, for the latter is alone competent to say by periodic examination of the urine, the effect upon the disease by excluding and permitting different articles of food and drink.

NOTES ON DIABETES

Diabetes is a disease characterized by the passage of a large quantity of urine containing sugar, excessive thirst, excessive appetite, muscular weakness and languor. It is much more frequent among the wealthy than the poor, because of their sedentary habits, and over-indulgence in eating.

Scientific investigation shows that normally blood contains a small but constant percentage of sugar. When this amount is exceeded, there is an overflow into the urine. This is nature's method of restoring the blood to its normal composition.

There is a direct relation between obesity and diabetes. A great medical authority holds that certain obese individuals, though they may have no sugar in their urine are still diabetics. There is an excess of sugar in the blood, but instead of passing out through the kidneys as waste, this sugar is converted into and deposited as fat. This then is a diabetic habit, which antedates the diabetes. Diabetes in corpulent persons rarely appears before the fortieth year. Emaciation may subsequently occur but usually fat and diabetes persist together.

Patients live for many years in comparative comfort, with mild form of diabetes, now better, now worse, the condition varying under indiscretion in diet, fatigue, shock, nervous excitement or worry.

It is doubtful whether diabetes can be prevented. If there be a family history of diabetes, obesity or gout, such predisposed individuals should be cautioned at an early age against over-indulgence in starchy and saccharine foods. Such a predisposition can always be expected in gouty and obese subjects, and they should therefore avoid excess in eating and drinking in connection with sedentary living.

The regulation of the diet is the most important part of the treatment of diabetes. As a rule the intensity of the disease corresponds with the amount of sugar or sugar-forming substances in the food. All diet tables have as their basis the selection of foods which contain the least possible amount of starch or none at all, and the elimination of sweets. This is not always the case, however. In the emaciated the quality and quantity of food must be regulated without regard to the intensity of the diabetes so that there be no further loss of bodily weight, but rather, if possible, an increase of flesh. In the obese a rigid diet may be instituted with safety and positive benefit. Here loss of flesh is desirable.

Patients rebel naturally against the exclusion of starchy food, particularly bread. The natural craving for bread is intensified by the disease itself.

There have been many substitutes offered for bread. That made from gluten flour is the principal one. Few gluten flours are reliable. Some contain as high as 60 to 70% of starch. At the best, the bread made from gluten flour is tough, doughy, and difficult of digestion. It would be best if patients would be brought as little as possible in contact with the selection and preparation of their own food, because of the aversion that is likely to arise, and because of the mental depression that such constant attention to diet will produce.

For many years the writer has lived and associated with many who are affected with the disease. The necessities of the situation, and the keen desire to eliminate the many difficulties already discussed, have induced her from time to time to make many culinary experiments and combine variety with palatability in the preparation of the diabetic regimen for those so affected. She has succeeded beyond her expectations. None but those cognizant of the true state of affairs could distinguish any difference in the foods so prepared from those to which they were ordinarily accustomed. The patients themselves are relieved from the responsibility of selection and from the monotony of sameness. They do not suffer from mental depression, mingle in the amusements of the universal life, and attend to their ordinary affairs without thought of the absolute incurability of their disease.

To the obese and the diabetic, these recipes are dedicated, in the sincere hope that they all may be content with their lot and recognize in the vanity of pleasant and palatable dishes that they are not shut off from the enjoyment of all the good that life has in store for themselves and others.

NOT ALLOWED

Pears, rhubarb, grapes, potatoes, beans, carrots, rice, sago, tapioca, cornstarch, bread, cornmeal, buckwheat, beets, sweet wine, liquor, malt liquor, champagne.

NOTE

In making up these recipes, when sucre edulcore is specified, if desired saccharine can be used in its place. This sugar (sucre edulcore), which is a preparation expecially made for diabetic people, is imported but the saccharine can be purchased from any drug store. I have found that the sucre edulcore gives very much better results than the saccharine and also that the patients prefer the sucre edulcore for coffee or in anything where it is not cooked long. In preparing these foods if they are found too sweet or not sweet enough, more or less of these tablets can be used according to taste. One of these small tablets is equal in sweetness to one cube of ordinary sugar. They must always be dissolved in a liquid.

In regard to the flour, when flour is used as thickening or in any other case, gluten flour must always be used.

In the printing of the book it has been the intention of the author to leave sufficient space on each page for the writing of special comment of the physician or nurse, and for the insertion of additional recipes.
